In September, Dr. Paul Ching from the University of Minnesota, conducted a workshop to help faculty develop knowledge and tools about how to help students help themselves. An essential element in facilitating student success is a working relationship between faculty and academic advisors. This workshop is about how we can better work as a team to help students succeed. The session will cover the distinction between academic advising and faculty advising and consider how each area serves as an important resource in supporting our students. This workshop will initiate a positive, collaborative relationship between academic and faculty advisors, and explore how we can work with each other, and more importantly with our students.
